

the writer include a series of unexplained letters reflecting his hope that they could continue their marriage. In an interview, held in 1989, with Ray Evansome on 17y Close, Evansome took issue on 1979. Evansome described the incident by saying, "we had a fight. We were both going. He was not happy. It was not his fault and we got on with our lives. It wasn't that big of a deal."

Evansome's production expired uneventfully, and he had no more direct contact with the prison's justice system for almost five years—until, that is, June 11, 1994, the day after Evans' death, when he returned to his home in Birmingham and found that the police inquiry wanted to speak with him.

After the judge granted the search warrant, Evansome returned to the Birmingham house shortly before noon on June 11. At that point, the detective gave an order to David Thompson, one of the unlicensed prison officers guarding the perimeter of Evansome's property, that the entire area was now considered a crime scene—and since Evansome now had a warrant to search the
