Consequence Management: Operational Principles for Managing the Consequence of a Catastrophic Incident Involving Chemical, Biological, Radiological, Nuclear Or High Yield Explosives Cbrne Consequence Response Force,2013-01-16 To assist with a catastrophic mass casualty incident in the United States and its territories at the direction of the President the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff or the appropriate Combatant Commander may deploy the CBRNE Consequence Management Response Force CCMRF The CCMRF is trained and equipped to provide a rapid response capability following a catastrophic event Just as with all instances of Defense Support of Civil Authorities DSCA military forces respond only when requested Requests always work their way up from the local level After a major incident city leaders will ask for county assistance county asks for State assistance the State Governor asks for Federal assistance from the President If the President agrees a Presidential Declaration of Disaster is declared The Secretaries of Homeland Security

Defense and other cabinet members meet and determine the best course of action The SecDef may initiate activation of CCMRF units State National Guard units are usually mobilized under the direction of the Governor and remain State assets while CCMRF units are usually Title 10 under the direction of NORTHCOM ARNORTH and the Joint Task Force JTF Commander or the Defense Coordinating Officer DCO if a JTF is not stood up The CCMRF includes assets such as medical surge chemical decontamination and biological detection that may be helpful to the victims of a catastrophic event The CCMRF also includes communications force protection transportation supply and maintenance assets that can be used to establish command and control capabilities to facilitate additional military and civilian resources into the affected area Joint Doctrine for Civil Support notes DOD resources are normally used only when state and local resources are overwhelmed and or non DOD resources of the Federal government are insufficient or unable to meet the requirements of local and state civil authorities This workbook focuses on domestic consequence management under the command of USNORTHCOM The CCMRF mission is part of a broader Department of Defense DOD support package to the Lead Federal Agency LFA which is responsible for overall coordination of the response The primary agency is responsible for overall coordination of the response In many cases the primary agency is FEMA but not always In the case of many other emergencies the state government retains legal and operational leadership Often for these incidents there is no need to establish a Joint Task Force and the Defense Coordinating Officer remains the single point of contact for DoD Other Federal agencies may also support the response for example the FBI may assist in collecting evidence but the primary responsibility remains at the State or local level There is also likely to be significant involvement in emergency response by local authorities private organizations and individual citizens The legal political and operational implications can be complex When the CCMRF is deployed the event has overwhelmed local resources If the event is perceived as having terrorist origins the level of public concern will be especially high Public concern legal limitations and the need to collaborate with a wide range of other players establish a challenging strategic context

A Framework For Survival Kevin M. Cahill, 1993-06-15 In this urgent response to the challenges of our day Somalia Bosnia and beyond an international team of experts addresses the responsibilities of providing assistance to civilian populations caught up in conflicts and disasters The human consequences of famine and disease ethnic conflicts and military aggression are all too visible to concerned citizens everywhere How can human rights be protected in times of disaster What is the role of international relief organizations How can political diplomacy and health initiatives be brought together to ensure survival in a conflict ridden world This hard hitting book authored by renowned figures in medicine political affairs and humanitarian assistance covers a wide range of crucial issues from the plight of refugees to the economics of neglect It eloquently demonstrates how global cooperation on health related problems can open doors to political negotiation
